$12,000

In AD 194, Septimius Severus defeated Pescennius Niger, his Syrian rival for the imperial purple. Not being a particularly forgiving sort, in the next year Severus followed up this victory with a punitive campaign against the local kings of Osrhoene and Adiabene who had either openly supported Niger or had taken advantage of the upheaval in Syria for their own benefit. The campaign was a resounding success. Osrhoene was conquered and much of the kingdom was converted into a Roman province although its former king, Abgar, was permitted to retain possession of Edessa and its surrounding territory. Adiabene was also conquered, but seems to have been left largely in the hands of its king who is possibly to be identified with the Narseh mentioned in the Chronicle of Arbela. These victories prompted Severus to assume the honorific titles of Parthicus Arabicus and Parthicus Adiabenicus. While Parthicus Adiabenicus obviously refers to the conquest of the Parthian vassal kingdom of Adiabene, Parthicus Arabicus refers to the annexation of Osrhoene. The latter had a largely Aramean population that was ruled by the Arab Abgarid dynasty, hence the use of Arabicus. Severus' titles appear not only on the coinage struck in the aftermath of this early eastern campaign, but also on the Arch of Septimius Severus in Rome which was completed in 203. The present aureus celebrates Severus' campaigns against Osrhoene and Adiabene through its trophy type and explanatory reverse legend. It is unclear whether it might have been struck from plunder carried back to Rome by the victorious Roman army. (courtesy of Numismatica Ars Classica).

Recent scholarship has reframed the Attalid cistophori from a series emblematic of a closed monetary system, a theory proposed by earlier scholars, to a revolutionary coinage that defines an innovation in the structure of the Attalid state. Following the defeat of the Gauls in 166 BC, Eumenes II dramatically reorganized his kingdom. Civic structure now became the backbone of the state, with large amounts of money being spent to more thoroughly incorporate rural areas into the urban Pergamene kingdom. Key to this was the new cistophoric coinage, which was struck at a lower weight than the common Attic standard, to ensure circulation only within the kingdom. Andrew Meadows writes of the cistophoric issues: This was a coinage designed to look federal, rather than royal. The kings image was removed in favour of creating the impression of civic unity across clearly defined and identified space. Since the mintmarks that appear on a number of these coinages do not in fact designate sites of production, we might speculate that their inclusion was at least partly an element of the ideological programme. Xanthos has been suggested as the likely mint for this and related issues (See G.K. Jenkins, "Recent acquisitions of Greek Coins by the British Museum", NC 1959, p.33). However this may be questioned, since this stater and all the related pieces in the SNG Berry, ACNAC Rosen and SNG Von Aulock all fall clearly into the heavy weight classification. Thus Morkholm has in "The Classification of Lycian coins before Alexander the Great" (JNG 1964, pp 65ff), assembled evidence indicating that Xanthos was the home of the light standard and the heavy standard circulated in Central Lycia. That standard cannot be identified with any in use outside Lycia. The triskeles on the reverse is a solar symbol and a distinctive Lycian emblem connected with the national deity, Apollo.
