Boordgeld (board-money/ship money) consisted of metal and paper tokens issued by many Netherlands shipping lines from 1946 through the mid-1970s. Quite soon after the end of World War II, as trade, immigration, and general passenger travel became more commonplace, a need became apparent for a universal method of payment to be used during journeys on various Netherlands shipping lines. This was initially encouraged by the government of the Netherlands because of severe restrictions in the availability of foreign exchange. A second and far more important reason for using tokens was the fact that many crew members on the various ships flying the Netherlands flag were Javanese from Indonesia. Since passengers were likely to have the greatest variety of coins, banknotes and travelers' cheques from many different countries, it was decided to issue tokens to avoid confusion on board ship. Consequently, after boarding and/or during the journey, passengers could exchange their money for ship tokens, thus enabling them to pay for any goods or services which they required. During the journey, only ship tokens were accepted as payment. Paper tokens were initially issued but were withdrawn and replaced by metallic tokens.

- Ex C. Ehrhardt, Otago, New Zealand Collection and ACANS, Macquarie University duplicates. A most important book describing some 539 tetradrachms. This hoard is one of the largest and certainly best studied hoards on this period of Sicilian coinage. The hoard has coins from the following mints: Rhegion (10, see one important example in this sale), Akragas (8), Gela (29), Katane (29), Leontinoi (14), Messana (136), Naxos (5) and Syracuse (308, see an important example in this sale). The book examines Sicilian chronology in light of this and other hoards, making the publication the best study to date on this period.
