$500

Ex Spink-Glendining, London Auction 19th November 1975, (Lot 625, illustrated). Bernard of Saxon-Weimar had as his main target the Imperial fortress of Breisach. This was a strong place for during the whole war the city had always been occupied by Imperial forces. To build up an effective siege Bernard demanded that Freiburg's City Council help with the civil engineering work. A delegation from Freiburg lead by a Bohemian nobleman and officer in the Swedish army Friedrich Ludwig Kanoffski von Langendorff goes and sees Bernard but instead of consenting support to the delegation he complains about plundering, robbery and arson committed by his troops. Bernard flies into rage shouting and calling them names in an interesting mixture of German, French and Latin. It is not known whether Freiburg's help would have considerably shortened the siege but it takes Bernhard eight months before Breisach opens its gates. Of the 4000 inhabitants only 200 had survived who at the end had been fighting among themselves for the few rats left over as their only food. Cardinal Richelieu is full of joy. Bernhard however proclaims Breisach as capital of a Royal Saxon Government. To mark the festivities Freiburg has to ring all the church bells until the clapper of the biggest bell broke into pieces. In 1633 the attack of Breisach occurred. The catholic troops of the emperor were able to conquer and plunder the castle which before was occupied by the Swedes who were supported by the Protestant inhabitants of Ihringen. According to the reports about 15,000 litres of wine were taken. The goods of the inhabitants of Ihringen which was stocked in the castle, were totally lost. Reports tell about a loss of 200 horses and about 300 pieces of cattle, which gives a reference to the size of the castle. After several severe quarrels the castle was finally burned down by the emperors occupying forces.

Ex World Wide Coins, December 1983. In the Siege of Mainz (14 April-23 July 1793) a Coalition Allied Force (Prussia, Austria, and German States) besieged and captured the city of Mainz, Germany from the French forces. The Allies, especially the Prussians, first tried to take the city on the night to 17 June 1793. Since a relief army was missing, the war council was forced to take up negotiations with the allied forces on 17 July. On 23 July the remaining soldiers capitulated. Nearly 19,000 French troops surrendered at the end of the Siege, but were allowed to return to France if they promised not to fight against the Allies for one year.

Netherlands, Leyden (besieged by the Spanish, struck by St. Katherine's Hospital), copper Liard, 1574, (Mailliet LXXI,1). Very fine and rare.

As winter neared in 1574, the only food left in the city of Leyden was boiled horsehide. Suffering under a cruel Spanish occupation, the people of the Netherlands had pleaded with King Philip of Spain to ease his brutal oppression. When the terror continued, the Netherlands revolted. The motives of many were religious as much as political. Dutch Calvinism spread as a consequence of the revolt against Catholic Spain. When the Spanish besieged Leyden and urged its people to surrender, John Vanderdoes, leader of the defense, boldly replied that if the people of the city came to starvation, they would devour their own left hands, reserving their right hands to defend themselves. However, during five terrible months of siege, it is estimated that 6,000 of Leyden's 14,000 inhabitants died. The turning point, not only for the city, but for the long war itself came on October 3, 1574, when William of Orange (the leading Protestant magistrate of the Netherlands) implemented a costly but effective decision. After notifying the citizens of Leyden of his intention by carrier pigeon, he had troops raise the sluices of the dykes that protected the low-lying lands from the sea. As sea water flooded in, William's troops arrived in flat-bottomed boats and the Spaniards fled. 1,000 were not quick enough to escape and perished in the rising water, which was driven inland 20 leagues (60 miles?) by strong winds. The Spanish had been cooking stew and left behind their half-done pots of food. The starving people of Leyden devoured this "hutspot." At about the same time, Dutch barges arrived, loaded with herring, bread and cheese to relieve the famine. That the Netherlands became so strongly Protestant, was thanks in part to the sufferings of the people of Leyden. To this day, they celebrate the anniversary of the lifting of the siege. See note on the emergency paper issue as coinage in 1574 that was in our Sale 87 (lot 2960).

The California Midwinter International Exposition of 1894, known as the "Midwinter Exposition" or the "Midwinter Fair", was a World's Fair that ran for six months in San Francisco's Golden Gate Park. Its legacies are the M.H. de Young Memorial Museum and the Park's famed Japanese Tea Garden. It was the idea of M. H. de Young, editor of the San Francisco Chronicle. In 1892, U.S. President Benjamin Harrison appointed him as a national commissioner to the World's Columbian Exposition which was held in Chicago in 1893. Memorabilia from this exhibition is generally considered to be rare as many items were destroyed in the San Francisco earthquake of 1906.
